The New England Climate.

In this country, New England has, by universal consent, been given the title of the "Exercise Ground for the Elements." Mark Twain says of it: "I have myself counted 135 different kinds of weather in twenty-four hours. There is a sumptuous variety about it, that commands the stranger's adult. of weather in twenty-four hours. There is a sumptuous variety about it, that commands the stranger's admiration and regret. I met a man at the Philadelphia Centennial who was going all over the world, to study weather. I said to nim, "Don't you do it! You come to New England on a favorable spring lay!" Well, he came, and he made his collection in faur days. And he not orly had weather enough, but weather to sell, to invest, to spare, to give away to the poor. Every year the, people in New England kill a lot of poets who have written poems about "Beautiful Spring!" Casual visitors, who have got their ideas from some other places. Dazzling uncertainty! Plenty of it, too. Thunder awful! It sends a stranger down to the cellar and puts his head in the ash barret, Weather that sticks out hundreds of miles all around New England. Sho is packed as full as she can hold, but she can't accommodate the one hundredth part of her weather. Rains, hails, mizzles, drizzles, ice, frost, snow, thunder, lightning, winds from every quarter of the worst possible description, mild heats, flery glows, red hot blows, we've got 'em all! And then comes a day so lovely that we say: "There! I forgive you!" There is nothing in weather had very much the

The South Coast of England.
The Gulf Stream sweeps around this coast in such a hearty, genial fashion that it really brings with it another climate and latitude. It is indented, every few tries, with a deep curve in the beach, beyond which lies a little town consisting principally of charming villas and "cottages"—the cottages of the rich bearing small resemblance to the cottages of the poor—the usual seaside hotels and lodging houses, promenade and light house. The gardens about these places are often terraced down to the sea, and they are dreeth part of new wonton and the palies of received the part of new wonton thunder, lightning, winds from every more to fine worst possible description, mild heats, nery glows, red hot slows, we've got email: And then care a day so lovely that we say that the say that ing in weather that we have it is got in limites quantity, variety and infernality.

Out in the new State, which is the same old State—Heaven alone knows how old—there is a stretch of country with a most ideal climate, a sort of combination of all the best features of the North and the South, frosty, but not Arctic; warm enough to ripen the grain, yet not oppressive, really delightful. It is a country with very line timber and fine sward—so that the general effect of it is quite that of an English park, and people don't die there at all; they live to be a hundred and fifty and then just vanish, when no one is looking. Seriously speaking, it is one of the healthlest spots on this vast continent, and admirably suits people who distike both extremes in climate, who run away from the lakes and the blizzards of the Northwest. Perhaps the whole question of climates will be settled by the aeroplanes. Perhaps the whole question of climates will be settled by the aeroplanes. Perhaps people will the very day and get a remedy that is from the lakes and the blizzards of the Northwest. Perhaps the whole question of climates will be settled by the aeroplanes. Perhaps people will fly North, South, East, West on the wings of the wind like the birds, and have a thousand perches, but never a nest. Nothing could suit the restless people of this restless age and most restless country so well. No matter where they are they never seem to be content, Lut always to be wishing themselves somewhere else, so strongly is their discontent expressed. What they are teally seeking though they don't know it, is the climate of heaven for they are seeking as Pascal says, "not novelty, but the truth that makes us all free, happy and content—a deep wense of God's love to us; a perfect rust in it; a real delight in returning it in sweet filial fashion." With that, we can all live happily in any climate, good, bad or indifferent. Till then, in dear George Herbert's words. "we wait till sheer weariness tosses us to His breast," incomplete, lonely, dissatisfied, and as resiless as the sea. Each human being is but an island set in, the sea of humanity. "Not even the heart that is next our own knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh."

When you can go to Tragle Drug Co, this very day and get a remedy that is guaranteed to end the misery and humiliation of every catarrh sufferer or money back, why don't you do it?
